GREATEST F1 DRIVERS

37 y.o.

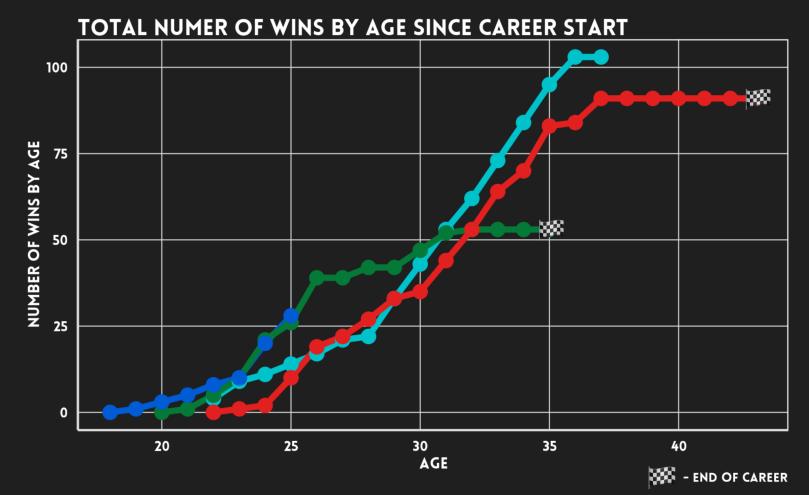

Michael Schumacher 53 y.o.

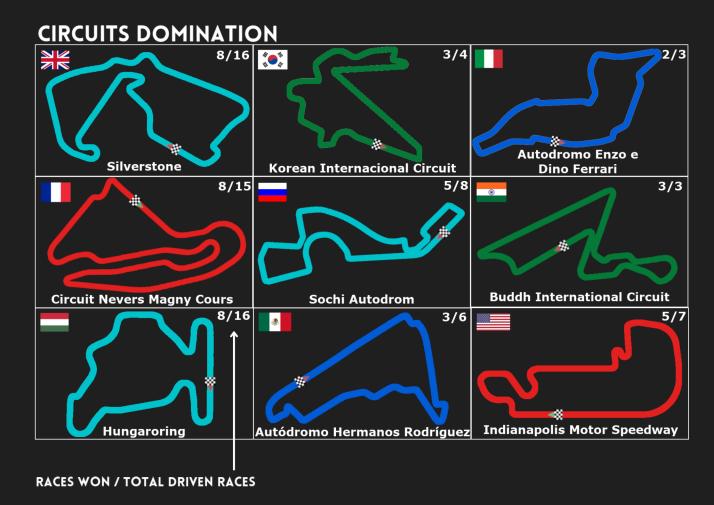

Sebastian Vettel 35 y.o.

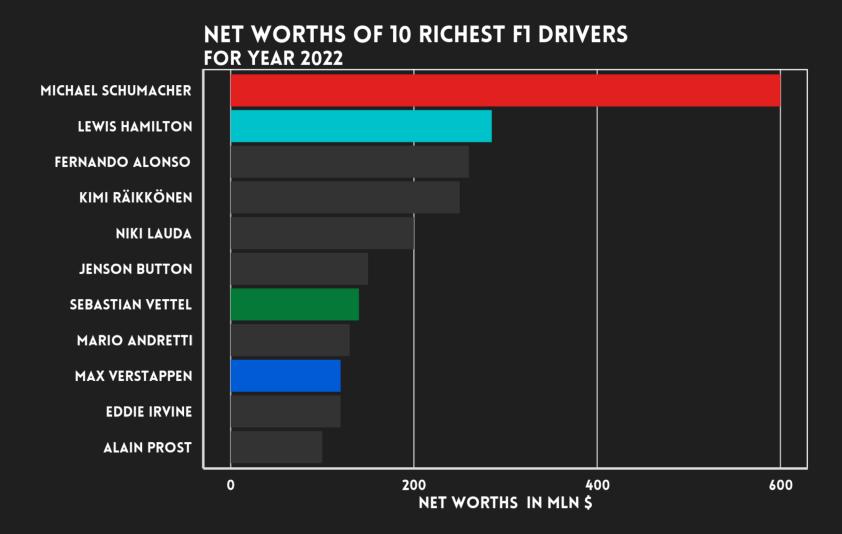

Formula One is an exhilarating sport with plenty of unique careers in its history. The discussion regarding which drivers deserve to be called the best could last for hours. The following list, however, focuses on the subjectively selected four drivers, which, in our opinion, are the most popular and entilted in modern history of Formula One.

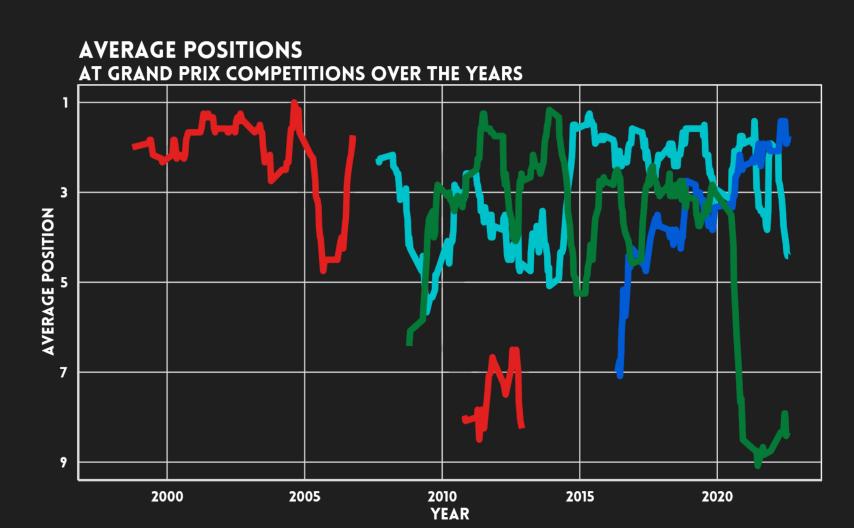

Undoubtedly, one of the most important and prestigious indicators of a Formula One driver's success must be the total number of Grand Prix won in the career. By looking at the rate at which this number grew across the seasons, one can achieve valuable insight into the driver's career. For each driver, the graphs follow a similar shape, but in the case of Vettel and Verstappen, a sharp increase in wins begins earlier. Will Verstappen be able to keep such pace?

Many circuits in Formula One are known for their character. Nuances in construction, cheering of the audience, or drivers' individual preferences determine which podium composition is predicted on a given track. But is it justified? The ratio between the number of races won and completed shows that certain tracks have their favourites, which is not without significance when planning the strategy for the season.

In each Formula One Grand Prix, only 20 drivers compete, making it one of the most competitive sports to enter. In addition to contracts with teams, getting to the top guarantees numerous sponsorships. For this reason, drivers accumulate a substantial fortune throughout their careers.

Each driver celebrated numerous victories in a certain golden period of their career. We tracked drivers' performances over the years by looking at their race positions using a 12-months rolling average. Such a comparison shows the long-term interaction between drivers and allows one to compare the stability of their performance on the track.
